EXTERNAL SHARE FOR JIRA & CONFLUENCE

TIME TO SHARE WHAT YOU KNOW

After creating an External Share link to a Confluence page or Jira issue, there are two ways to share the link with a user outside of your instance:

1. Copy the URL of the External Share version of the page or issue and paste it into an email or instant message.
2. Click "Send via email", which will send your External Share link to the email address you enter using an email template.

The second option is particularly useful if you need to notify the user of the following conditions in relation to the link:

- That the link can only be accessed with a password, and what that password is
- That the link has an expiration date
- That the user can view and/or add comments and attachments to the page or issue
- That the user needs to be logged in to an External Share for Confluence or External Share for Jira account to access the link
- That the user will need to register an account with External Share for Confluence or Jira, plus the link they need to do that External Share for Confluence and External Share for Jira allow you to customize your email template for External Share links, so that you can have your own content and branding in all the messages going out. You can tweak it to fit your tone of voice, or provide the external user with some extra information about your company. As the standard email template has a footer that says, "This email was sent by External Share", you may want to delete this and include your company name instead. In some cases you may be required by law to include certain things. For example, Polish companies are required to include their company number in communication channels like email.

However, the main reason we developed this feature is so that you can say what you want to say, in the way you want to say it, in the emails your company sends out. It makes your messages more relevant, more personal, and more likely to get actioned.

Create secure links to live Jira issues and Confluence pages and share with whoever you want
