We were inspired by...

"Releases serve two purposes – building release notes for the public and plan task for internal teams. Making a distinction is not possible, so Marketing and Support see detailed tasks and subtasks they should not know about."

"We need to go through a release approval process, which includes the PM signing off from a Confluence page. We also need to get sign off from certain people within the organization to ensure everyone is A-OK, which tends to be on email or Slack."

"I don't have any way to coordinate the longer term 'measurement' activities that come from a release, like retention and adoption. Releases are extremely 'delivery' focused and don't handle non-development tasks well."

"It would be useful to display some indicator of how much work went into a release to get an at-a-glance perspective of dev velocity."

Why Progressive Delivery?

Releases are more than a deploy to production.

Delivery and development tasks need to live in harmony.

Guard rails for rolling out quickly, yet safely.

Making launches a collaborative decision.

PROGRESSIVE DELIVERY

Go/no-go rituals in Jira Software

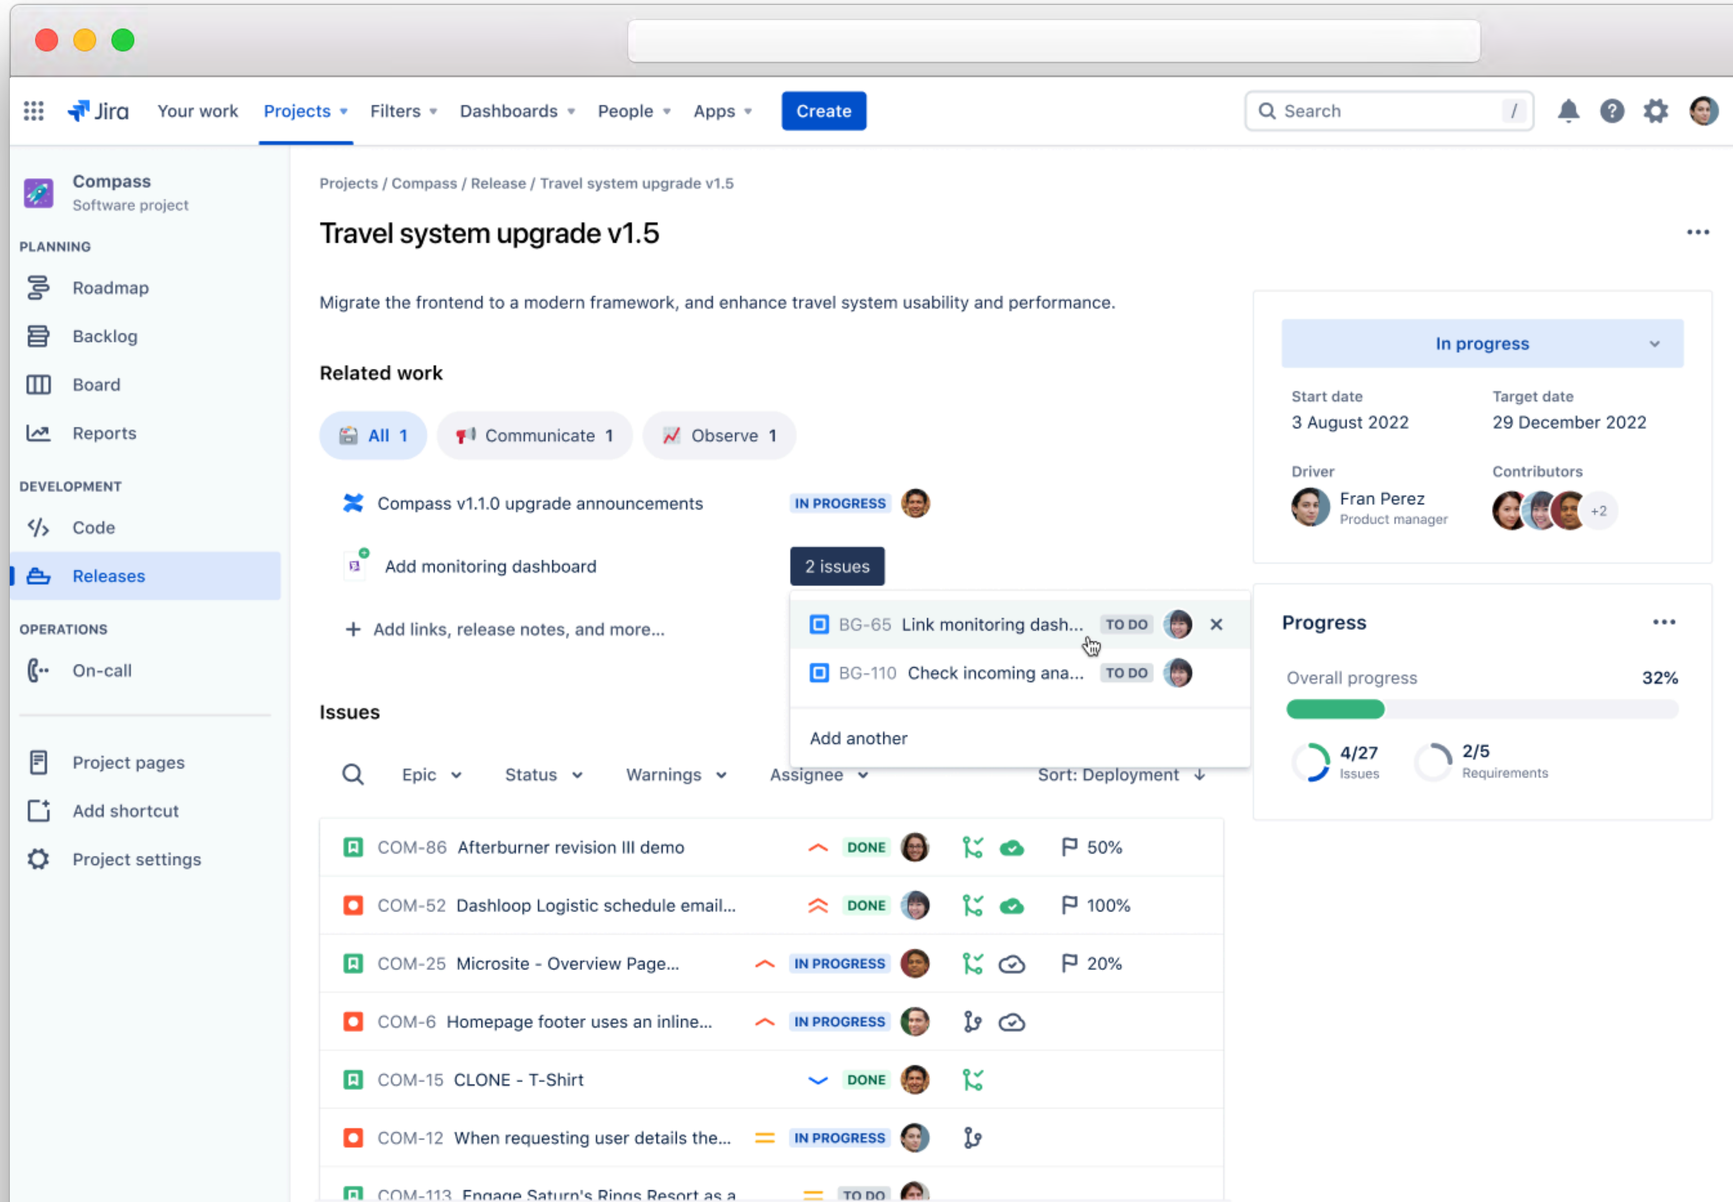
Bring designers, marketers, and analysts into Jira to launch with confidence

Collaborative rollouts

Confidently make roll-up/down or promote-build decisions as a team

Audit & product documentation

Get sign-off and log testing/ rollout events automatically, creating the most reliable repository for product docs



Agenda

Open toolchain vision

Customer release Cchallenges

Progressive Delivery capabilities

Jira Software releases hub

Progressive Delivery vision

Prerelease experience
Run go/no-go rituals collaboratively to determine release readiness together

Continuous deployment
Ship code incrementally and safely without gatekeeping practices

Deeper automations
Extend automations to Atlassian products and third-party integrations

Rolling out phase
Establish effective feedback loops for making incremental rollout decisions
